

Daniel Karume Recommendation Letter

To any potential employers of Mr. Karume,

I'm going to cut to the chase. You're here wondering if Daniel Karume is a capable individual and the right fit for your business. From my experience I strongly believe he could be, but whether he actually is, is only for you to decide. I won't send you into the wilderness without a flashlight though, here I will be detailing my experience with developer, Daniel Karume, including the good and bad so you can choose whether his expertise is the right fit for you or not.

Me and Daniel worked together over the span of three months on a highly converting, sales ripping machine of an ecommerce store. He optimistically told me it would take a month but that was before he knew the insane amount of revisions and attention to detail I would have him implement. He later found out that I'm borderline insane and this site was not going to be a breeze. Still, Daniel did not fold, he strapped his boots and he rose to the occasion like it was just another daily occurrence.

Over the span of three months Daniel created an ecommerce site with these key features; an easy to understand and interactive UI, a smooth UX that gave a seamless experience for customers, a backend admin side with analytics, and a high converting UPI that made it easy for my business to do its main thing, which is make money. He showed his proficiency in Next.js, React, Node.js, and API architecture.

What was even more impressive about Daniel is that, despite the occasional tweaks, additions, and corrections I requested, the site was entirely conceptualized, implemented, and materialized by him. I gave him freedom to create and he did so in such an amazing manner.

Though the project took longer than we both expected, Daniel actually moves extremely fast. This is partly due to his very effective way of communication. He takes his time to really understand the needs and wants of his employer. This allows him to quickly build or revise any errors. There's been numerous times where I found a scary bug in the site but in only a few minutes to a few hours, I would receive a text saying "It's done", making me just as happy as surprised. This happened when I asked him to completely redo the order of product listing on the front-end (customer side) and backend (admin side). About 30 minutes later he told me he was done and I was completely ecstatic at how amazing the site looked.

Now, though I had a great experience with Daniel there are some things I wish he did. For one, I wish after altering code, he would check if everything was moving smoothly on my end. This is honestly a small critique because anytime I voiced a problem it more than often got fixed immediately. This second critique is honestly neutral but it gives insight on how to do business with him. Daniel is a man about his money, right fully so, he's very skilled and people of that caliber don't come cheap. Make sure you provide proper incentive and compensate him fairly. When money is involved he turns into a different beast, they type you want on your team. Coding is very tiring but when you provide a proper price tag to his work, he's as alert as a WWII veteran.

Daniel is an extremely reliable and hard working individual. He takes his work seriously and is actually passionate about helping and servicing people. I gave an idea to Daniel and he nurtured it to life, like a mother does to her baby. He didn't rush, he took his time and gave immense attention to detail to make sure it was the most accomplished piece of work he could give me as his client. A trustworthy individual and the exact person you want to work with. There's a reason he stays occupied with contracts and freelance work. Some of the best talent you can find.

From,

Mohtion

CEO of VauntVault, Clothing Ecommerce Platform

Website: Vaunt.shop